

 CORDAGE
COMMERCE CENTER

Welcome to Cordage Commerce Center, where history meets innovation to create a truly exceptional space for our future tenants. Get ready to be amazed by the remarkable story of this iconic landmark and its surrounding community.

Did you know that Cordage Commerce Center was once a renowned Rope Factory, The Plymouth Cordage Company. The Plymouth Cordage Company was responsible for supplying a staggering 1/7 of the world's rope? It's mind-boggling to think about the scale of its operations.

One of the most fascinating artifacts in the Plymouth Cordage museum is the original order for the rope used in the USS Constitution. Yes, the very same rope that played a role in American history is right here, adding to the rich heritage of our center.

For years, Plymouth Cordage Company supplied rope to merchants, government entities, and private parties. The production took place in the rope walk, an outdoor area adjacent to the main building, where skilled craftsmen created high-quality ropes.

In 1824, Bourne Spooner had a vision and founded the company. What made Spooner truly remarkable was his commitment to abolitionist beliefs, which shaped the very essence of the company's philosophy. Inspired by factories in the South, he employed free labor, making a significant impact on the community and fostering a spirit of equality and engagement among the employees.

Spooner's innovative approach to employee relations and company benefits led to a highly motivated workforce. He firmly believed that happy employees would be more productive, and his vision proved successful.

The strategic waterfront location played a vital role in its success. Situated on a 45-acre parcel just two miles north of Plymouth Rock, the center boasted 130 feet of frontage on the harbor, offering direct access to shipping channels. This enabled seamless transportation of raw materials and efficient distribution of finished goods worldwide.

In 1885, a devastating fire destroyed the Field Mill, but the setback didn't dampen the company's spirit. Instead, they rebuilt with resilience and constructed Mill #1 (what's now building #10), designed to be more fire-resistant. As production ramped up, Mill #2 followed in 1899, solidifying the company's growth.

With each passing year, the company flourished. By 1916, Plymouth Cordage Company had become the world's largest rope manufacturer, employing over 2,000 workers. This incredible achievement highlighted the dedication and hard work of the community that thrived within the company.

The former Plymouth Cordage Company paid special attention to building a sense of community within its walls. Having happy workers was always at the forefront of its values. A true sentiment still embraced today at the Cordage Commerce Center.

"When the 55-acre property, locally known as Cordage Park, was purchased over 20 years ago, the intention of the Plymouth Station development, was to provide more waterfront access, additional housing, vibrant office and medical space to the local community. It has been affirming to see the recent completion of the Harborwalk Apartments and the continued vibrancy of Cordage Commerce Center."

- Cordage Owners

Taking care of the employees' well-being was a priority for Cordage from the beginning. Augustus P. Loring, in particular, went above and beyond by establishing the first nutrition clinic circa 1900. This clinic provided diets to ensure that the workers and their children received proper nourishment. In response to a scarlet-fever epidemic in 1903, the company hired two nurses who were on-site daily. These nurses conducted clinics and classes in nursing and infant care, eventually leading to the employment of a resident doctor for additional medical support.
