MARKET OVERVIEW

'LEASE VS BUY'

Nearly 10% of American households use a storage facility every year, according to Radius+. In an age where Americans are both obsessed with decluttering and reluctant to part with their belongings entirely, self-storage as an asset is gaining ground. For self-storage investors, it's a profitable, recession-proof option, with lower overhead and less hands-on management than many other commercial real estate investment opportunities. According to an article in REJournals, while other real estate asset classes, even those previously considered stable, took heavy hits during the pandemic, self storage is expected to register a compound annual growth rate of 5.45% from 2021 to 2026.

More and more businesses are opting for hybrid or remote work styles. The demand for self storage was driven by business owners re-evaluating the need for office space and brick-and-mortar stores. Many of these owners are downsizing or abandoning office and retail spaces altogether, prompting the need for extra storage space.

Self storage is also booming on the residential side. Remote work is forcing families to transition an area of their home to office space. Self storage is the perfect solution for those extra household items.

During the pandemic, people lost their businesses and their incomes. When this kind of downsizing is forced on them, people still want to be able to keep their possessions. Again, self storage comes to the rescue. When the economy is healthy again, businesses will grow, larger homes will be purchased, and shopping will resume in full force. Families will need storage space for the overflow that will come with a healthy economy. In one way or another, there is an unflinching need for self storage.
