Gardena, CA

Located in the heart of the South Bay submarket of Los Angeles, Gardena offers strategic access to major logistical corridors, including proximity to the Ports of Los Angeles and Long Beach, and key freeways such as the I-110 and I-405. This infill industrial location benefits from limited available land and strong regional transportation connectivity, making it ideal for businesses that rely on efficient goods movement across Southern California.

Gardena supports a stable residential base with a population nearing 60,000. The median household income and home values reflect a balanced economic environment with sustained local demand. The surrounding area is well suited for industrial tenants, manufacturers, and last-mile distribution operations due to its blend of urban density and direct highway access.

Greater Los Angeles Industrial Market Overview

The Greater Los Angeles industrial market remains one of the most critical logistics hubs in North America, driven by its proximity to the Ports of Los Angeles and Long Beach, the nation's two busiest container ports. This extensive gateway handles over 40% of all U.S. containerized imports, feeding a highly integrated industrial supply chain that stretches inland through the Inland Empire and across the country. The region's industrial inventory exceeds 1 billion square feet, encompassing a wide range of assets from legacy manufacturing plants to modern high-bay distribution centers. With limited land availability and strict zoning, new development remains constrained, keeping vacancy rates among the lowest in the nation despite recent economic headwinds.
