MARKET OVERVIEW

Northern New Jersey Industrial Market

With April underway, industrial owners across Northern New Jersey continue to confront persistent supply-side pressure and subdued space demand, resulting in vacancies approaching mid-2017 levels.

Last year, Northern New Jersey owners navigated the weakest demand environment in over a decade, as net absorption posted the lowest annual reading since 2012. The first three months of 2024 set the tone early, with move-outs outpacing move-ins by roughly 2.1 million SF – the lowest quarterly tally since 2008.

New supply additions, meanwhile, totaled nearly 3.1 million SF last year, a slowdown from the record of 4.2 million SF posted in 2023 but more than double the five-year pre-pandemic average. This dislocation between supply and demand carried over into this year, pushing the average vacancy rate to 5.4%, still well below the national benchmark but a level not seen here since 17Q3.

Annual rent growth continued its steady slowdown to 3.6% in April, marking a sharp deceleration from over 7% last year and leaving the measure far below the 10-year average of 7.9%. Notably, the metro's rent growth has remained above the national average since mid-2016. And while the vacancy rate is expected to plateau at current levels in the near term, new supply additions are likely to again outpace space demand in 2025, pressuring asking rents. Accordingly, the Base Case forecast anticipates that annual rent growth will continue to moderate through the summer before accelerating past 4% by the end of the year.

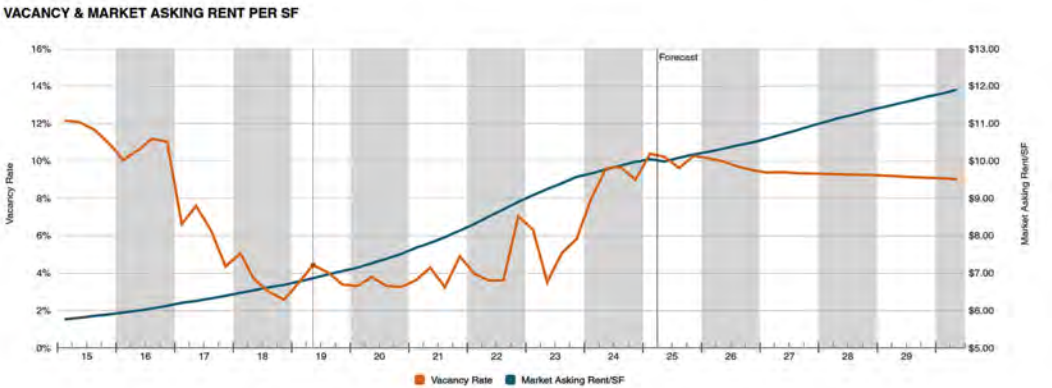

Despite an active pipeline by local pre-pandemic standards, Northern New Jersey space under construction represents just 1.7% of existing inventory. From a national standpoint, that is one of the lowest figures among industrial markets with inventories of at least 200 million SF. Population density and opposition to industrial development in areas like Somerset and Warren counties have kept construction from pulling too far ahead of tenant demand.

Trenton/295 Industrial Submarket

In the Trenton/295 submarket since early 2024, the average vacancy rate has surged nearly 500 basis points to settle at 10.2% in 25Q1. Annual rent growth, meanwhile, is likely to remain under pressure in the near term. The measure slowed to just 2.3% from over 6% early in 2024.

Following last year's supply additions, this submarket has 34.5 million SF of industrial stock, primarily in Trenton, Hamilton, and Ewing. Inventory here has grown by 9% since 2021, largely owing to 1.3 million SF of deliveries in 2022. The average footprint here is about 50,200 SF, roughly 31% bigger than the typical box size in the nearby Northern New Jersey metro.
