TRADE AREA INFORMATION

BLYTHE, CA

Positioned near the California-Arizona border along the heavily traveled I-10 corridor, the Blythe trade area plays a vital role as a fueling and service stop between Phoenix and Los Angeles. With $\pm 46,642$ cars passing daily, including long-haul trucks, RVs, and commuter traffic, the city captures a constant flow of transient demand that sustains its network of gas stations, quick-service restaurants, and convenience retailers.

Blythe serves as the last major California stop for eastbound travelers before entering Arizona, making it a strategic location for fueling, rest, and last-minute purchases. The city's economy is rooted in agriculture, transportation, and tourism, and it benefits from a significant influx of seasonal visitors drawn to the Colorado River, off-road recreation, and desert tourism. During peak travel periods and holiday weekends, local businesses experience surges in traffic and fuel sales.

The city is experiencing steady economic activity, with infrastructure investment and modest new housing development supporting the resident population. At the same time, limited retail competition and geographic isolation give operators a protected trade radius and stronger pricing power. The area has also seen recent interest from national QSR chains and budget hospitality brands, further validating the market's long-term demand for fuel and traveler services.

For fuel operators and investors, the Blythe trade area offers a rare combination of consistent traffic, cross-border appeal, and a durable service-based economy that supports fuel sales year-round.
