MARKET ANALYSIS

METRO PHOENIX OFFICE MARKET

Despite post-pandemic challenges, the Phoenix office market has seen a steady rise in asking rents, registering at $31.33 per square foot at the end of Q2 2024. The total vacancy rate stands at 25.0%, largely driven by increased sublet spaces and larger building vacancies. However, smaller floorplate buildings remain relatively healthy. Investment sales have shown a significant uptick in transaction volumes in 2024 as investors capitalize on discounted property prices. Rental rates continue to increase, albeit at a slower pace, as landlords manage higher operating costs and inflation. This complex landscape highlights the volatile nature of the Phoenix office market.

Vacancy

Phoenix's office vacancy remains among historically high levels at 25.0% in Q2 2024, driven by a notable increase in sublet vacancies, which rose to 5.3%—500 basis points higher than pre-pandemic levels in Q2 2019. Larger buildings, typically over 50,000 sf, generally show higher vacancy rates, reflecting ongoing challenges in the market. However, office buildings with smaller floorplates (below 10,000 square feet) remain healthy at 10.7% vacant. Some larger transactions, such as the Dutch Bros HQ for over 130k square feet, pose more certainty as companies grasp their new post-pandemic work models.

Rent

Phoenix office asking rents continue to rise, registering at $31.33 per square foot annually in Q2 of 2024, despite a lack of demand and record-high vacancies. Landlords are juggling rising operating costs with inflation as well as the increase of construction costs and tenant improvements for larger Class A properties. As over 23 million square feet remain vacant on the market as of Q2 of 2024, the rate at which rents are increasing is decelerating when comparing quarters on a year-over-year basis.

Sales

Investment sales in the Phoenix office market for both traditional and medical office space exceeded the last four quarters, reaching $275.9 million for Q2 of 2024. This marks a dramatic rise of 111.4% from the $130.5 million recorded in Q2 of 2023. Notable investments in Q2 2024 were made by groups like Columbus Properties and Breakwater Property Partners.
